Pauline Frederick in "Roads of Destiny"

Pauline Frederick needs no introduction to the American public—lovers of the spoken drama and the screen fans alike, have come under her spell. Exhibitors who show Goldwyn pictures know what a box-office magnet she always has been.

The supporting cast contains the names that are drawing cards in themselves to all picture-goers—Richard Tucker, John Bowers, Grace Darmond, Maude George, Hardee Kirkland, Willard Lewis and M. B. Flynn.

The emotion-compelling story is from the play by Channing Pollock, founded on one of O. Henry's most popular tales. In its version it repeated the great success of the short story. O. Henry's name stands for all that is human and wise, brilliant and humorous, in American literature, while Channing Pollock is known as one of the most successful writers of the American spoken drama. "Such a Little Queen" was his earliest eminent success, "The Sign on the Door," the latest. Frank Lloyd, well known to exhibitors, directed the picturization of the story. The picture is really a tremendously graphic and dramatic presentation of three complete stories, each subtly interwoven. In the North David Marsh takes a central part in a powerful Alaskan drama, which follows the course of the iron law fate has willed him. Pauline Frederick plays the part of a roulette dealer in a gambling joint. In the East David is the young inventor for whom a beautiful society favorite, played by Miss Frederick, sacrifices herself. The picture swings back to reality and culminates in a climax that is typically O. Henry in its electrical consequences. The story is surcharged with emotion. The suspense is cleverly sustained and the peculiar fantasy of dream events colors the whole, with a mystifying effect that is decidedly novel. It is a story with a universal appeal, brilliantly acted and superbly directed. At the Tabb Monday, March 28th.

Kerr's Selection Urged by Langley

Appointment of Judge Charles Kerr, of Lexington, Ky., as federal judge of the Panama Canal Zone, and of Judge McKenzie Moss, of Bowling Green, Ky., as solicitor for the Postoffice Department, is considered practically certain by Washington Republicans in close touch with President Harding.

Representative John W. Langley, of Kentucky, called at the White House yesterday to urge appointment of Judge Kerr to the Canal Zone position.

Former Congressman Caleb Powers, who retains a residence in Kentucky, although living in Washington, also was a White House caller yesterday. He is understood to have asked for an appointment as Commissioner of Fisheries, but the President is said to have determined on Reno S. Harp, of Frederick, Md., for the position.
